Supermarkets urged to help cut food waste

Supermarkets have been asked to end offers like "buy one get one free" deals to try to reduce the amount of food being thrown away by shoppers.

The new report by the House of Lords European Union Committee says 15 million tonnes of food is wasted in the UK each year.

The Committee said: "We are urging supermarkets to look again at offers such as 'buy one get one free', which can encourage excess consumption which leads to food waste."

Shoppers often end up having to bin food from these multiple item offers because they struggle to eat it before the 'use by' date. Leftover food from shops and other places should be passed on to charities and food banks, the committee said.

How 3D printing is changing the shape of lessons

There have been dramatic headlines about 3D technology, encompassing ideas to use 3D printers to make clothes, food, firearms and the parts of a house.

It's also making an impact on education, with plans to put 3D printers into schools in the United Kingdom and the United States. Schools are getting interested in this "rapid prototyping" technology. But there are still the usual barriers - access, funding, teacher awareness and confidence. However, many learners are getting 3D design whether or not their schools are ready. One of the most illuminating advocates is a 14-year-old schoolgirl from Manchester in the UK. Amy Mather won the European Commission's first European Digital Girl of the Year Award last year. The schoolgirl has presented her ideas in front of expert audiences, including Campus Party at London's O2 Arena, Wired Next Generation and the Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts (RSA).
